

How a people first approach may unlock transport system challenges

Aotearoa New Zealand's transport system is being challenged – by climate change, to keep people safe, and how we think about and consider urban design. As kaitiaki of the transport system, Waka Kotahi is thinking differently to connect communities for more positive social outcomes. Hear Dr Deborah Hume, National Manager Multimodal and Integration talk about the importance of putting people first through urban design and function, providing better choices to get around, and ultimately building a more cohesive, safe and resilient transport system to take us into the future.
