

Defining Urban Amenity: Bringing a people-centric approach to transport design in the central city

‘Urban Amenity’, a term that is often considered to mean seats, trees and nice paving, however, if we want to create more liveable cities, we need to think more broadly. This talk will share a definition that has been developed to provide a people-centred, holistic perspective, and propose that this approach is critical for ensuring we design our central city streets in a way that meets people’s needs as well as transport objectives.
