

Unlocking the potential of today's graduate dietitian: building strong systems of personal infrastructure

Ms Janeane Dart, Monash University (Australia)

Janeane is a Senior Lecturer and an Advanced Accredited Practising Dietitian and has over 25 years' experience working as a Dietitian within Australia and the UK. Janeane has extensive experience in clinical practice and as a clinical educator. She followed her passion for student education into the higher education sector, and has been in academic roles for over a decade in Australia and the UK. Janeane teaches across the undergraduate and postgraduate programs in Dietetics and Nutrition Science at Monash University in Melbourne Australia. Her teaching areas of special interest are client centred practice, food and culture, personal development and professionalism. She has led an integrated approach to teaching and assessing professionalism. Janeane has published research in the areas of health professional education including competency based assessment, programmatic assessment and professionalism. Janeane is currently a PhD candidate, researching teaching, learning and assessing professionalism in dietetic education in Australia and New Zealand. She has recently published in the Journal of the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics (2019) a paper titled, Towards a Global Definition of Professionalism for Dietetic Education: A systematic review of the literature.

Mrs Annemarie Knight, Kings College (United Kingdom)

Annemarie Knight is a Registered Dietitian with the Health and Care Professions Council in the UK. She has extensive clinical, leadership and education experience. She is the Programme Director for Dietetics at King's College London, leading undergraduate and postgraduate pre-registration dietetic education. Her teaching interests include communication skills, foodservice and food and culture. She is a member of Higher Education Group of the British Dietetic Association and part of a working group reviewing the curriculum for the profession in the UK. Her research interests include dietetic practice, education and culture.

Dr Dianne Reidlinger, Bond University (Australia)

Dianne Reidlinger is both an Accredited Practising Dietitian in Australia, and a Registered Dietitian with the Health and Care Professions Council in the UK. She is the Associate Dean Learning and Teaching for the Faculty of Health Sciences and Medicine at Bond University, where she also leads the community and public health nutrition domain for the Master of Nutrition and Dietetic Practice program. Dianne holds a PhD from King's College London. She is passionate about dietetic education, and her publications include several education-focused journal articles.