Abstract

The realm of the notion of spatial mobility ranges from the routine moves of corporeal body to circulatory and other systems at local, regional, national, international, and global levels. The growing volumes and the increase in frequency of spatial moves have become the megatrend since the collapse of feudalistic regimes worldwide. Several research echoed the interrelationship between the elements of regional moves. As new phenomena, multiple displacements from one home to another gradually grew during the epoch of globalisation.

However, the development of political and administrative thinking about migratory politics has been starting the term of migration policy for decades, for instance. Later, a sort of broader concept, namely, the migration management has become more popular in national and international circles. Nowadays, the governance of migration might replace the previous two terms without clear ordering and bordering. This polemic reflects the necessity of the creation of original research in these subject matters multiplied by recent pandemic context.

The aim of this special session is to provide fresh ideas for contributors and participants and to clarify the open questions surroundings. In parallel with the formulation of scientific dialogues, the applied aim of the session is to bear original proposals erected from the concept of the governance of territorial mobilities for policymakers and other stakeholders at many spatial levels due to their high developmental potentials.
