

Housing markets: information, taxes, prices

Florence Goffette-Nagot

Housing affordability is a key issue currently in cities of developed countries. Traditional determinants of housing prices have been extensively studied. New topics are investigated in recent research in economics: the impact of taxation, of public policies, and of available information on housing prices and markets.

This session aims at gathering papers studying these issues with thorough econometric methods.